The two-week workshop program included guest lecturers and field trips. Among special lecturers was North Carolina's commissioner of juvenile correction, Blaine M. Madison of Raleigh.

By using a step-by-step analytical approach, the workshop sought to cover within a short period of time the causes, extent and methods of controlling juvenile delinquency. Its overall objective was framed around an effort to help the teach-er to deal constructively with students as individuals and as members of groups in the school and community.
