according to the USDA's Climatological Service, shows that if the Blight hits corn, it won't be early. No one will stick his neck out and predict exactly what the weather will be for the next few months from now - few expect the blight, if it occurs, to hit any sooner than it did last year," states Richard H. Bryant, County Extension Chairman.

The reasoning behind this thinking are the weather factors that influence the blight. In addition to temperature, air flow, rainfall, dew and relative humidity play important roles.

The chances of southern leaf blight striking a second time with the same or increased severity may not be as great as some gloomy forecasts have led the nation's corn farmers to the door. This proves that we can

Those who play the odds, and every farmer plays the odds with each crop he plants, may find the chances of blight in 1971 slimmer than last year.

· In 1970, wet and hot weather arrived on the cornfield scene about the same time Hurricane Becky blew in billions of blight spores north from the south. The stage was set for an epidemic produced by a triangle of destruction. Plant Pathologist explain the three sides of the triangle as (1) host plant, (2) warm humid weather, and (3) spores present. Break any side of the triangle and the chances of blight are greatly reduces if not eliminated.

"Farmers who play the odds can place their own wages on the possibility of all three factors being present at the same time in the same place to cause a blight epidemic," further states Mr.

While a great deal of Florida's 71 corn is normal cytoplasm, the blight has been reported in the 'T" cytoplasm that has been planted. How much of a buffer "N" cytoplasm will produce is not known. The mere fact that it is there should help reduce the amount of spores which can move up in our direction during 1971. We also have to consider the amount of spores already in North Carolina and in particular-Perquimans County.

"J.C. Wells, North Carolina State University Pathologist, told us in the corn meeting here in February that we should cover all the corn residue possible. This could prove to be a real problem for our farmers, since we do not use many flushing or bottom plows," according to Mr. Bryant. "If we did, when we rowed up all - or at least most of his corn residue would be back on top of the field. He also suggested rotation, that is - do not follow corn with corn. Of course, his third suggestion is to plant all the "N" corn you can get, and then the top of the "B" varieties. F2 corn, seed from last years' crop, from "N" varieties will give you some reduction in
