Relief May Be In Sight For Communities Without Doctors

Relief may be in sight for small communities across North Carolina that are experiencing a shortage of doctors, dentists, nurses, pharmacists and other health professionals.

A group of 158 University of North Carolina students will soon fan out across the state to perform some of these critically-needed services.

These students have pledged one year of service in these communities for each year of financial aid received from the N.C. Medical Care Commission.

The 158 students have pledged a total of 290 years of health services in medical facilities or in public and mental health areas approved by the commission.

UNC students now enrolled here with the Medical Care Commission loans totalling $246,604 this year are studying in the following programs: dental hygiene, 5; dentistry, 56; medicine, 40; medical technology, 7; nursing (baccalaureate), 6; pharmacy, 39; and physical therapy, 5.

Just how does this loan system work? Let's take an example of a mythical student Tom Trest.

Tom, a North Carolina resident, has been accepted at the UNC School of Medicine, but will be unable to attend unless he can get financial assistance. He applies for and is approved to receive a N.C. Medical Care Commission loan of $2,000 per year which he hopes to renew each year during his training.

After four years Tom will not owe $8,000 plus interest but instead will have the amount "forgiven" upon spending one year of practice in a commission approved area for each year he received a loan.

The General Assembly makes these funds available to the Medical Care Commission an encouragement for more young people to enter the health professions to alleviate shortages in the more critical areas of North Carolina.

But the commission is faced with the problem of cutting its "encouragement" of new students by 53 per cent due to an unrecommended portion of their requested budget.

"Up until this year, the commission reserved in escrow amounts to see each student through graduation at the time the commission requires a personal interview even before a student applies for a loan. The commission is located at 437 N. Harrington in Raleigh and inquiries can be addressed to P.O. Box 25469 or called to 919-233-7461.

The amounts of loans vary, depending on the field of study. While students in medicine, dentistry, optometry and certain master's degree programs can borrow up to $2,000 each school year, a student in a hospital school of nursing is limited to $500 a year for two years. Other students are limited to $1,000 each year.

First year students in some programs are not eligible for loans. Based on academic failures among such a high percentage of first-year students, the Medical Care Commission rules that loans would not be available in educational programs normally admitting students immediately out of high school.

What happens when a student with a loan drops out of school or for some other reason is unable to carry out his pledge to practice in an eligible area? He is required to repay his loan at 7 per cent interest beginning at the completion of his course or from the time he dropped out.

Male?

Perquimans County has enjoyed many historical firsts. Most of these have been the first occurrence of their kind in the State of North Carolina.

But, we'll bet not many people in the Albemarle Area are aware of this interesting fact:

The nation's first Post Mistress resided in Perquimans. She was Sarah deCraw and was given her appointment by President Washington.
