

ECU Medical Report

Students entering East Carolina University's new School of Medicine next September will have a busy year. Each student will receive approximately 900 hours of formal instruction about equally divided between lectures and laboratory or clinical exercises.

Toward the end of his first year, the student will receive first hand instruction in the practice of community medicine supervised highly qualified physicians in various community hospitals and clinical practice settings in the area.

The medical school curriculum is designed so that the subject matter progresses from normal structure and function to the abnormal. Careful attention has been given to the sequence of topics within each course to ensure the building of adequate foundations before moving to the next level.

A great deal of interdependence exists among the courses presented the first year medical student. The student takes many courses at a time; each course provides information necessary for the understanding of every other course.

Normal structure and function of the human body is taught in the medical courses of Anatomy, Physiology, Biochemistry and Cell Biology. Utilizing dissection of cadavers, demonstration and microscopic study, Anatomy provides the student with a basic knowledge of the large and the small structures of the body.
