Several Families Are Uprooted By Chatham Dam

Many families in rural Orange and Chatham counties have been uprooted by the New Hope Reservoir project. Homes and churches were razed and businesses forced to relocate or close. People left their farms for urban communities or trailers.

Others stayed in the area and willingly or bitterly set out to restructure their lives. Common problems led to increased participation in community meetings.

Soon, a documentary that examines the ways these rural people adapted to change will be offered to groups across the state. It also may be shown on WUNC-TV.

Titled "Our Lands, Our Lives," the documentary was produced by Dr. Fritz Hafer of the University of North Carolina Department of Anthropology and Richard Doble of Apex, a graduate student in the University's Department of Radio, Television and Motion Pictures.

It will offer, said Hafer, a chance for people in other communities to learn about the trauma of change, what it means and what can be done about it.

"At first, some people didn't know they were able to organize or even entitled to organize. But they did come together effectively because of the reservoir."

"Now, we can show others what happened to them. We can say, 'Here's what was going on and here's what they did. You can have the benefit of their experience.'"

Hafer has been interested in the New Hope area for several years—"as a citizen and an thropologist." His current project was funded by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities through the N.C. Committee on Continuing Education in the Humanities.

The Endowment traditionally seeks to involve academic humanists in community affairs for other than research purposes.

Hafer said his work in the New Hope area did not change anybody's mind about the reservoir and was not intended to.

"Our effect was to give these people more of a sense of unity and consciousness of kind. And they got an awareness that what they do with their lives is an important thing and can have meaning far beyond the community."

He found the people receptive. "Once we explained what we were doing, they were enthusiastic and interested. They picked up my idea for a documentary and formed a steering committee to assist me."

Hafer and Doble worked in the New Hope area from January, 1972 to August of 1973. They attended meetings and talked with dozens of residents.

Their grant paid for more than 1,000 photographs, nine hours of taped meetings and conversations, and the "extremely valuable" services of Mrs. Billie Rogers of Pittsboro, who worked as local coordinator for the project and made arrangements for most of the meetings.

Mrs. Rogers also edited a monthly newsletter that informed residents of church, community and other meetings where their problems and decisions would be discussed. It also contained summaries of past meetings.

Citizen participation increased. That goal, Hafer emphasized, was the main reason for his work in the area and the National Endowment's reason for supporting it.

Hafer gives the people themselves most of the credit for the increased participation in the community's problems. "We were a drop in the bucket to what they had going themselves. The fact that outsiders were there really meant something to them. They were overwhelmed with our attention and they said we were doing a great job. But they were doing it."

"These people reached the rural whites and blacks who do not usually participate in these kinds of meetings. Their interests usually are not represented."

A key issue for all the people was the recreational development of New Hope Lake. The Army Corps of Engineers will lease the park area to Chatham County for $1 a year and the county will be responsible for everything in the park but roads.

came into Hertford with my daddy, I took a hold of his hand to keep from getting lost. Hertford seemed so huge," he said.

Since Mr. Hunter says he has time for television, he had some comments on the medium. "It's too much advertising. It's more advertising than programs," he said.

However Mr. Hunter has a favorite program. He likes "This In Your Life" with Ralph Edwards.

When asked about his favorite foods, Mr. Hunter said he liked fried foods.

Mr. Hunter was asked for his secret of long life. "Was it his diet, his daily habits, or what which has made him have a somewhat healthy life, except for a stroke, ten years ago?"

Mr. Hunter replied, "The Good Lord's work has helped me live so long." That's a wonderful secret.

Building your money:
How we can help you build thrift habits for your child.

If your child is ten or over, it's time to start teaching him or her about money building.

First, give us a call. We'll arrange a special tour of Bank of North Carolina, N.A. for you and your child. We'll explain how a bank puts money to work. We'll see the big vault.

Then, open a savings account for your child. (Minors under the age of 15 must have a parent or guardian co-sign to open an account—a N.C. banking law.)

A savings account can be opened at Bank of North Carolina for any amount of $1.00 or more.

A special savings register or passbook will be made out in your child's name.

We'll explain to your son or daughter how interest works. How we use their money and pay them for using it. We'll explain that they receive 5% interest, paid monthly. And we'll explain how compounding works (it's compounded daily) and how they can earn money on the interest they earn.

We suggest they have a goal in mind; a benchmark to work towards. (Saving for "tomorrow" doesn't mean much to a ten-year-old. But saving for a new bike or riding lessons is real and important.)

We'll try to make your child feel comfortable in our bank.

Then it's up to you to encourage your children to save their dimes and quarters for the next trip to the Bank. And encourage them to earn money to go into their savings account. We'll let them know we're proud of them as their balance grows. You'll want to do the same.

The child who learns that bank means more than piggy bank is learning to be a financially responsible adult. And as a parent, that can help you build your own money. And building your money (and your child's) is our business.
