Ash from wood fire can be dangerous

The use of wood burning stoves and fireplace inserts is on the increase, and so is the number of forest fires caused by ashes removed from stoves and fireplaces, according to the North Carolina Division of Forest Resources. The light powdery ash left from a wood fire can insulate hot coals and glowing embers hiding them from view. It is not unusual for these coals to smolder for several days before they are totally consumed.

Ashes removed from a wood stove or fireplace should be put in a metal bucket and placed outside away from buildings. The bucket should be secured or anchored so it will not be tipped over by people, animals or the wind.

Some people prefer to store the ashes in a larger metal barrel for later use in a compost pile or in a garden. The Division of Forest Resources urges people to treat ash from wood stoves and fireplaces the same way good campers treat a campfire. Pour water on the ash, stir, and add more water. Make sure that warm cheery glow stays in the stove or fireplace and doesn't become a hot raging inferno in someone's forest.

The bucket or barrel should be covered, however, to cut off the oxygen and prevent the ashes from being blown away. Any ashes removed from a wood stove or fireplace should be allowed to sit outside in a covered container for several days before being added to a compost pile or spread on a garden.
