Poll favors small schools

The 1980 Gallup Poll, a joint effort with the Kettering Foundation, had several cheering messages for the nation's public schools — and especially its small ones.

First, there was a halt to the six-year decline in public confidence in the schools — one that had those polled who would give schools a grade "A" fall from 18 to 8 percent. The slight increase in confidence over last year is not "statistically significant," say the researchers, but the ratings do seem to indicate that the public is aware of the renewed emphasis on basics in many school districts.

The public also believes more than ever that schools are important to one's future success. How important was asked both in 1973 and in 1980. The first time, 76 percent of the public said they felt schools were extremely important to success; this year the percentage was 82. This year the Gallup Poll has asked people about their confidence in schools as an institution, compared to other institutions in society. The public schools were given a rating of "a great deal of confidence" by 28 percent of those polled. They came in second behind the church and way ahead of the courts, all three levels of government, labor unions and big business.

 Of special interest to small school leaders is the result that those living in rural communities and small towns and cities (under 50,000 population) are the most satisfied with their schools.

Several other results relate to the strengths of rural and small schools. For example, the local school board was overwhelmingly chosen to be the governance level that should have the greatest influence in deciding what is taught in the local public schools (68 percent). Also, 85 percent of those polled nationwide believe that parents should be asked to meet with school personnel to work out programs to be followed at school and at home — an indication that the public favors close family ties with the schools. People in small communities were less likely to approve of strikes by teachers.

Chorus sets show

On Monday night, Dec. 15, at 7:30 p.m., the Perquimans High School Auditorium will come alive with the voices of the Perquimans County High School Advanced Chorus as they present their annual winter music program. A wide range of music has been planned. Admission is free and the public is invited to attend.

Parents of exceptional meet

Several parents of Perquimans County's exceptional students met last Thursday afternoon in order to discuss methods they could utilize to help their children at home.
 Lillian Jordan, chairperson of the parents' group, called the meeting to order, and Estelle Felton, Perquimans County liaison between home and school, gave the invocation.

 Eileen Cooke, from the Developmental Evaluation Center, Freida Bunn, of the State Department of Public Instruction, and Pat Parker, of the Regional Center, presented the program, followed by a group discussion.

 The Parents of Exceptional Children will meet again on Feb. 5, 1981.
