Always keep your eyes protected

What do working on a farm, planting a small garden and cleaning up around the house have in common? According to the National Society to Prevent Blindness — North Carolina Affiliate, each poses high risks to unprotected eyes.

"Whether planting a corn field, a backyard vegetable garden or a few rose bushes, eyes must be protected," says Wiley Elliott, Eye Safety Chairman of the North Carolina Affiliate. "The Society urges rural farmer and suburbanite to keep eye safety foremost when beginning springtime tasks."

Among the Hazards are pesticides, fertilizers and household chemicals which can injure eyes and even blind if eye protection is not worn. Upon contact, many chemicals such as ammonia, can cause instant and severe burns — resulting in permanent vision loss. Product safety instructions, as listed on the package, should be followed. Chemical-type goggles should be worn whenever mixing, applying or spraying the product.

"Lawn mowers, too, can pose eye hazards," the Eye Safety Chairman comments. "Ground debris can be thrown into the face of the operator or a bystander by the mower's blades. Before mowing, fields and lawns should be thoroughly cleared of any ground debris like rocks and twigs."

"When mowing, safety goggles or glasses should be worn. These will protect the eyes against any material that can be flung by the blades. For added protection, the Society suggests that grass catchers be attached to home mowers."

Among the other eye-hazardous activities listed by the Society are hammering with nails, chipping cement or cutting wood. "In all cases, material can be flung into the eyes, causing injuries," says the Eye Safety Chairman.

The Society points out that safety glasses and goggles are available at most home improvement centers, hardware stores and lumber yards. "Safety eye wear is inexpensive," Mr. Elliott adds. "Eye injuries aren't!"

For more information about home and farm eye safety, write for a free copy of the Society's pamphlet, "Eye Safety is No Accident." All requests should be directed to: National Society to Prevent Blindness —

North Carolina Affiliate, 1033 Wade Avenue, Suite 208, Raleigh, North Carolina 27605.
