CORPORATE MYTHS

There are many reasons why people feel they should incorporate their businesses. Very often these reasons are based on misinformation about the advantages of being a corporation.

There are a number of things that being a corporation will not do for you. It will not automatically make you more profitable. It will not necessarily limit your liability on all transactions. It will not necessarily reduce your overall tax bill; it may, in fact, increase it.

If you incorporate an existing business, you may find that your long established suppliers now require new financial statement information. They may also request that you sign personally as a guarantor of the corporation's line of credit with their company. Most closely held corporations are required to have the personal guarantee of the major shareholder in securing a line of bank credit for corporation purposes. This guarantee has the effect of not limiting your liability in reference to those bank loans.

In an attempt to reduce business income taxes, you may find that the incorporation of your business has not only increased the actual income tax bill, but also increased payroll taxes because the previous proprietor is now an employee of the corporation.

There is an income tax election that allows certain qualifying corporations to be taxed somewhat as a partnership. This election is referred to as Subchapter "S" election. The Sub-S corporate tax election allows most corporate gains and losses and tax credits to pass directly to the shareholders. Therefore, the corporation functions in the same legal capacity as any other corporation, yet has the income tax consequences passed to the shareholders, pro rata.

Because of the increased costs of operating as a corporate entity, and because of the many legal and tax considerations, I suggest that anyone considering incorporating discuss the matter with both their accountant and attorney.
