Trent, a rising senior at the North Carolina School of Science

Trent is studying medical genetics, microbiology, microanatomy, all biology, growth anatomy and disease prevention. She also meets with a clinician, Dr. Robie, two hours every afternoon, who serves as her mentor. Trent, who would like to be a neoNatomologist, is an honor student and a runner.

She recently became the state champion in the Women's 800 meter and she also holds the state record in that event. Her coach, Mark Adams, says that she has excelled in any track or field event that he placed her in.

Don't overload freezers

If you're packing more food into your freezer than it can freeze in a day, you may not be satisfied with the results.

Extension News
north carolina AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION SERVICE
By Juanita Bailey

Overloading slows down the rate of freezing, and that could mean loss of quality or even spoilage of frozen foods. So don't overload your freezer, especially right now when it's tempting to freeze a lot of garden-fresh produce at one time.

Put only the amount of food in your freezer that will freeze completely within twenty-four hours. This is about two or three pounds of food for each cubic foot of freezer space. Both freezer space and capacity will be written on the back of your freezer or in the owner's manual.

For fast freezing—and a good frozen product—place new packages in the coldest spots in the freezer. If you have a quick-freeze compartment or shelf, use it. If not, put the unfrozen packages as close to the walls as possible. Just leave a little air space between packages—cramping things in too tightly can prevent proper air circulation. This will force your freezer to work overtime.

Also, keep warm food away from frozen packages. Direct contact with the warm packages could cause the frozen product to lose some of its quality.

So don't overload your freezer this summer. You'll have tastier, safer frozen products without overworking your freezer.
