Storm surge is hurricane's most deadly threat

Coastal communities, the first to be hit by hurricanes, should always be alert and aware of a hurricane's most deadly threat—the storm surge.

A terrifying phenomenon, the storm surge is a raised or great dome of water, often 50 miles wide and 10 to 25 feet higher than the surrounding waters, which moves swiftly and unpredictably within the storm's perimeter. It usually sweeps across the coastline near the area where the "eye" of the hurricane makes landfall.

This enormous water mass can submerge coastal communities in an instant and can flood low-lying areas for miles inland. Therefore, when a "hurricane warning" is issued and evacuation recommended, all residents of coastal and low-lying areas should leave their homes and businesses without delay.

Homes, cottages, and condominiums near beaches are especially vulnerable to a hurricane's high tides, storm surges, and flooding, reports National Hurricane Center experts. Studies have shown that as many as 50 percent of those residents in the likely path of an oncoming hurricane have failed to evacuate when warned to do so. Many people who have chosen to take this risk have perished.

Being prepared is essential to hurricane survival. A regular review of safety tips and precautionary measures will maximize your protection.

Know the following terms: A "hurricane watch" is issued for coastal areas when hurricane conditions are expected to occur within 24 hours in a specific coastal area. These conditions include winds of hurricane force, dangerously high tides and waves, or a combination these conditions.

The following tips are basic are very important: Do keep listening to your local radio or TV stations for weather advisories and special instructions when a hurricane threatens. Be sure to have battery-powered radios and flashlights with extra batteries on hand. Your battery-powered radio could be your only source of information in a hurricane emergency.

Board up or tape windows for protection against wind-driven debris. Although tape may not prevent windows from breaking, it helps prevent flying glass. Secure outdoor objects such as garage cans, lawn chairs, and porch furniture.

Those not immediately directed to evacuate their homes should be certain your supply of non-perishable food is adequate. Store a supply of drinking water in clean bathtubs or sinks, bottles, or cooking utensils. Your city's water supply could become contaminated. Fill your car's fuel tank in case evacuation becomes necessary. Service stations could close if electricity fails.

Avoid becoming trapped in an automobile on an open road flooded by high tides, storm waves, or torrential rains. Driving in such areas is dangerous and can be further complicated by traffic jams. Get an early start in evacuating your area.

As a hurricane approaches, leave mobile homes for a more substantial shelter. Mobile homes, even if firmly secured, are extremely vulnerable to both high winds and flooding. Also, plan to leave if you live on the coastline, on an offshore island, near a river, or in a floodplain.
