Coordinators make olympics possible

The mission of Special Olympics is to provide training and athletic competition in a variety of well-coached olympic-type sports for mentally handicapped individuals. It is the Special Olympic Coordinator, the backbone of the Special Olympic program, that carries out this Special Olympic mission.

Special Olympic Coordinator is an active individual. She is involved with many school, church and community projects. She is also the TMH teacher at the high school Our coordinator is Kathy Ansink.

She strives for excellence. Kathy, along with thousands of other coordinators are to be saluted. Her striving is a labor of love—a love for others. The "others" include students and young adults who have heard repeatedly that "you can't." Kathy, and coordinators like her, provide the opportunity for Special Olympics to say "yes I can."

Kathy, thanks for making it possible!

Making sense out of annual reports

A spice manufacturer laces its version with a new scent each year. (Last year's was Chinese Five Spices.) A financial data supplier puts its on video cassette. And a major food products company included 'cents off' coupons in its. But once you get beyond these frills, all annual reports follow basically the same pattern for providing information.

It's a good idea to go back and read the annual reports of the past few years to test a chief executive's credibility and determine how good management's predictions have been. Look to see how projections made in the the past compare with the corporation's subsequent results. How did the CEO's promise to increase the earnings of the company fare? Were research and development projects completed on schedule and within the budget outlined by the chief executive?

The annual report is, without question, a valuable source of information whether you're a shareholder or potential investor or someone considering a job offer with the company in question. But according to the North Carolina Association of CPAs, you sometimes have to read between the lines to get the full benefit of the contents of an annual report.

If read carefully, the section called "Management's Discussion and Analysis of the Financial Condition and Results of Operation is" can provide gainful insight.

Begin your analysis with the first section which generally contains the chief executive's letter to shareholders and management's discussion of the company's condition. The letter generally highlights the company's financial data, summarizes the year's events and details the company's goals for the future. In addition, many chief executives use the letter as a forum to express management's position on relevant social or public policy issues. While the letter to shareholders makes every attempt to put the company's best foot forward, a good letter will point out the firm's weaknesses as well as its strengths.

The Securities and Exchange Commission requires this section to include information about liquidity, capital resources and results of operations.

The balance sheet and income statement form the core of the annual report. The balance sheet shows where the company stood on a particular date and as such should be viewed as a snapshot rather than a moving picture. The balance sheet is divided into two parts. One part shows what the company owns—its assets. The other shows what the company owes—its liabilities—and its net worth or shareholder's equity.

Be suspicious of reviews that stress the future—this may be a sign the company doesn't want to talk about the present. Also be wary of special themes. Sometimes when a company wishes to divert attention from financial trouble, it gives the annual report a special focus. An annual report that highlights the accomplishments of its employees just might be coming from a company that had a bad year.

In short, the balance sheet reveals the book value of the company; its economic value may be significantly different. The company's net worth for financial statement purposes is nothing more than total assets minus total liabilities.

An annual report can provide you with a wealth of information, but CPAs maintain that you should consult with a financial expert before making an investment decision.
