Two states enact phosphate laws

The legislatures in the states of North Carolina and Virginia passed bills in April, 1987 and March, 1987, respectively to ban the sale and use of phosphate laundry detergents for household use. Both bills become effective January 1, 1988.

Godd laundry practices are always important but become more critical when phosphate detergents are not available. This is particularly true where water is hard, where a high concentration of iron in the water is present and where clay soil contributes to the laundry load. In all instances, steps must be taken to ensure satisfactory results.

Since phosphate-based laundry detergents will no longer be available in North Carolina and Virginia as of January 1, 1988, products available in powder form may contain the builders sodium carbonate and sodium silicate. Sodium citrate may be found in some liquid laundry detergents. Other liquids contain no builders, but are formulated to be less sensitive to hardness ions.

When water is hard, more detergent is needed for washing a load of clothes. Increasing the amount of a granular nonphosphate product may aid in soil removal, but it will also increase the amount of precipitant. The use of a nonprecipitating packaged water softener may help.

Iron in water can cause yellow discoloration on fabrics that may appear as distinct rust spots or evenly distributed over the entire item. A phosphate product is most effective in holding the iron in solution so that the use of a nonprecipitating packaged water softener is necessary in the wash and rinse waters. Chlorine bleach may intensify the discoloration so it should not be used in treating rust stains. In cases where an iron condition is too severe, the installation of an iron filter in the water supply system may be necessary. When adjustments in laundering procedures are necessary, here are some suggestions to help achieve good results:

If you live in a hard water area, you may want to consider the installation of a water softening system to reduce some of the laundering problems caused by hard water.

Dissolve detergent in wash water before adding clothes.

Read and follow package directions for all cleaning products, but remember that the amounts recommended are based on moderate water hardness and average soil and load sizes. Hard water, very dirty clothes and large loads require extra product for good cleaning.

The use of bleach, presoak or detergent booster products and pre-wash soil and stain removers aids in removing stubborn soils and stains. An increased amount may be necessary.

Sort clothes carefully, making separate loads for whites, light colors and dark colors. To prevent damage to delicate items, don't wash them with heavy sturdy clothes. Wash very dirty clothes separately to keep dirt from redepositing on less soiled items.
