4-Hers solve mystery at camp

Seven Perquimans County youth participated in a biotechnology camp at Chowan College recently.

Shiloh Kime, Kali Murphy, Sally Miller, Victoria Spearman and Douglas Frierson looked for clues and tried to solve a crime at the innovative camp.

Junior counselors Madonna and Charde Garner served as group leaders, while Juanita T. Bailey, Extension Agent, Family and Consumer Sciences, 4-H Youth Development, accompanied the Perquimans County delegation.

The youth learned about the use of biotechnology in agriculture, careers in the field of biotechnology, and how biotechnology is used in solving crimes. The program featured a medical examiner and Crime Scene Investigators with the State Bureau of Investigators.

The youth learned about DNA and actually did a couple of experiments where they collected DNA samples. Included in the overnight camp was an exercise during which the youth were given a murder mystery to solve. They were presented with the case, studied alibis of the suspects, participated in a campus-wide scavenger hunt where they found clues to help them solve the murder, and even had the opportunity to question the suspects (local actors/actresses).

The youth worked in teams to make it more competitive and interesting.

The final exercise which helped them solve the murder mystery was an electrophoresis experiment where they compared DNA samples of all the suspects and made their decision on who they thought was the real killer.

At the conclusion of the camp the youth were asked if they would like to see this camp conducted annually and the response was very positive.

The camp served 13 northeastern counties.

Web site provides Farm Bill information

Farmers and others interested in details on the 2002 Farm Bill have access to that information through a Web site created by faculty in North Carolina State University's Department of Agricultural and Resources Economics.

The Web site (<http://www.ag-econ.ncsu.edu/farm-bill2002.html>) provides information on how the Farm Bill will effect North Carolina commodities, including cotton, peanuts, the dairy program and more. The site also includes information on marketing under the new Farm Bill, information about the tobacco buyout program and links to sites where additional information may be found.

Conservation programs are a hot topic in the new Farm Bill, and those who want to take advantage of new or expanded conservation programs need to be aware of when to submit applications for the different programs, according to Ted Feitshans, extension specialist in the Agricultural and Resource Economics Department of N.C. State's College of Agriculture and Life Sciences.

"This Farm Bill represents the biggest increase in conservation spending in history," Feitshans said.

Yet, Feitshans believes that resources for funding the myriad conservation programs will be limited, so growers must get applications in early.

Applications for most of the programs will be made to the Farm Service Agency or Natural Resources Conservation Service.

The Farm Bill Web site includes links to North Carolina offices for each of these agencies. County centers of North Carolina Cooperative Extension also can help growers locate the agency office that serves their county.

Livestock and poultry producers can benefit from programs that will provide cost-share payments to help meet new environmental regulations, particularly those affecting dry-litter poultry operations. Environmental Quality Incentive Program (EQIP) funds, for instance, can be used to help growers prepare or upgrade comprehensive nutrient management programs.

The Technical Service Providers program establishes funding for government employees or private businesses to provide technical services. More information on the program should be available soon.

Administrators for several of the new programs are seeking public comment, which can be submitted by e-mail. Feitshans said such comments, when specific and substantive, can help shape public policy.

The Web site will be updated to reflect new dates and information as it becomes available.
