Ben Chavis Faints After Meet

Rev. Ben Chavis, civil rights activist, who has been sentenced to 29 to 34 years for allegedly firebombing of a Wilmington grocery store during racial unrest there in 1971, has been on a hunger strike at McCain Prison in McCain, North Carolina since April 30th.

Ben was transferred from Caledonia Prison Farm in Tillery, North Carolina to McCain Prison which is really a prison hospital because he had talked to prisoners about their rights. However, the authorities at Caledonia Prison and W.L. Kautzky, Chief of Program Services for the North Carolina Department of Prisons, claim that he was sent to McCain for his "safety". In a hearing which was held in Raleigh on Friday, May 7th, evidence from Commission revealed that it was not for Ben's "safety" but because of what was claimed to be his disruptive influence. When the prison official was asked if Ben had led any demonstrations or had caused any disturbance at Caledonia, the answer was "NO". The officials feared that he might organize the prisoners to express their grievances. In an attempt to isolate Ben, the officials sent him to McCain where he is housed in a hospital ward with tubercular and mental patients. Yet he is not mentally or physically ill. He maintains that he has been exposed to inmates with tuberculosis, who he said take showers in the medium-security wing where he has been assigned. Kautzky said he believed state regulations isolating tubercular inmates from the healthy population were enforced at the prison, but was uncertain about the shower situation.
