WSSU Students Visit Howard

WINSTON-SALEM—Two Winston-Salem State University students, Karen Coleman and Larry Brown, are participating in the Howard University Cooperative Physics Program being held in Washington, D.C.

The purpose of the program is to enable schools, such as WSSU that do not offer a major or minor in physics to do so by sending their students to Howard University for a maximum of three summers or a minimum of one summer for their advanced undergraduate training in physics.

The program of study for the students while at Howard University includes physical mechanics, electricity and magnetism, thermodynamics, optics, modern physics, mathematical methods and general physics.

The advantages of the program are two-fold with benefits to both the students and the institution. In addition to educational benefits, the students receive full support, including travel and tuition, books, room and board, and incidental expenses. Through the program the University will receive funds for needed equipment to strengthen the current physics program aside from expanding the physics offerings; and funds are provided for faculty release time for the current physics instructor to develop the physics curriculum.

WSSU, which is making strides towards establishing a degree program in physics, is participating in this developmental program for the first time this summer.

students were selected for the summer study program based on their scholastic achievement in academic areas which support their expresed interest in physics. Both Ms. Coleman and Mr. Brown are juniors majoring in mathematics. Upon completion of their studies they will receive minors in physics. Ms. Coleman is a resident of Norlina N.C. and Mr. Brown is from Roper, N.C.

The program is funded by the Office of Education, Title III/HEA (Basic Program) from a grant received by the District of Columbia Teachers College who coordinates the program with Howard University serving as the assisting institution.
