Bush, Duncan and Crowe were fighting, Bush said. The girl involved in the case pushed Bush into Duncan and it was then that Bush began to run, he (Bush) told the judge.
Bush said he turned around and Duncan ran into a knife that the defendant was holding.
Bush will not be tried as a 14-years-old. Because of the serious charge of murder, he must stand trial in Guilford Superior Court. Crowe, because he is 16, also will stand trial as an adult.

desk in Foust's service station at 702 E. Market Street.

Foust said he and Clark were in the service station getting ready to close up, and said Massey was making out a report at the desk when Herring came in the door, said "Mr. Massey!" and began shooting.

Foust testified that Herring shot six times at a distance of about two feet from Massey. A stocky man with self-assurance, Foust re-enacted the shooting, taking the part of the slain officer.

When he reached that point in his role where the officer was struck by the first bullets, he slumped over in the witness' chair in such a realistic swoon that a white-haired deputy sheriff standing near the courtroom loor rushed forward to assist him.

Before the deputy reached him, Foust rose with simulated great effort from the chair, staggered down in front of the jury and hit the floor with a thud.

Dr. Richard A. Kelly, assistant Guilford County medical examiner, said Massey died from a bullet wound in the heart. Massey was also wounded in the right shoulder, right hand, and the neck, Dr. Kelly said.

At one point the lights were turned out in the courtroom so that colored slides showing Massey's wounds could be projected. The screen was toward the jury and away from Herring, who got up and moved so that he could see the slides.

Herring appeared to be calm throughout the trial.

While Kornegay spoke, the dead officer's cap and uniform, stained rusty brown from dried blood, were hanging from a clothes rack at one end of the jury box and the solicitor frequently called the jurors' attention to those and other exhibits of the state.

Defense lawyers Robert S. Cahoon and J. Kenneth Lee, who was appointed by the court to defend Herring, made an appeal to the jury for mercy.

Lee argued that while Herring might not be considered insane in the legal sense of that term that his actions on the night he killed Massey showed a degree of insanity.

Sermon On Mount

Cahoon, who spoke last and then briefly, began by reading from Christ's Sermon on the Mount: "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

He told the jury that Herring was a man who was very ambitious for his three children and who had provided a good home for them by working at two jobs.

"He drove himself until he became exhausted, that his nerves were frayed and his judgment impaired," Cahoon said. "He was at least temporarily deranged."

In his charge to the jury, Judge Crissman told them they could bring in one of four verdicts: First degree murder, first degree murder with a recommendation for mercy, second degree murder, and not guilty.

Defendant Weeps

Herring, a tall, strongly built man, was impassive throughout the trial until Cahoon began speaking to the jury. Then he broke down, put his hands over his face and wept quietly.

The jury got the case at 3:17 p. m. and stayed out 50 minutes.

Herring had regained his composure long before the jury came in with the verdict. After he was sentenced, he met briefly in a room beside the courtroom with his wife and their three small children. Then a deputy sheriff came to take him away.

While Herring's sentence is for life imprisonment, it does not mean that he will necessarily spend the rest of his life in prison.

Solicitor Kornegay said after the trial that on the average a prisoner sentenced to life imprisonment in North Carolina serves only about 10 years before he is paroled.
