Home Economics Education Threatened By Demand For Paying Jobs

The tremendous emphasis being placed today in preparing young women for remunerative employment was described last week at A&T College as a threat to the vocational home economics program in the nation's high schools.

Dr. Catherine T. Dennis, Raleigh, N. C., State supervisor of Home Economics, made this charge as she spoke at the annual Vocational Home Economics Conference.

"So much emphasis," she said, "is being placed on preparing young women for paying jobs that home economics education today must serve a dual role."

She told the group that there and replanning in the program, must be considerable rethinking not only to prepare young people for efficient and happy homemaking, but to prepare them for remunerative employment in fields related to home economics, such as food services and homemaking assistance, and others.

She said changes in the habits of American women indicate that home economics education must not only train young people to maintain good homes for "our children of today and citizens of tomorrow," but, also, to train them for opening new and related employment to the general field of home economics.

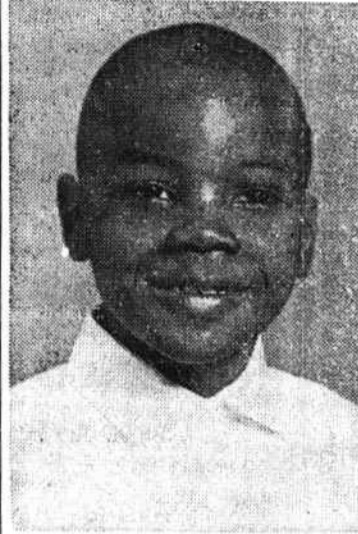

She said that home economics should never be relegated to the position of just another course in high school, because it is the only program devoted entirely to education for home and family life. "Certainly, we need this today as never before."

Dr. Gerald B. James, also of Raleigh, N. C., director, Division of Vocational Education, State Department of Public Instruction, in his keynote address explained proposed changes in the curricula of North Carolina high schools.

He described the new program as a giant step forward in providing improved vocational education and opportunity for the "majority" of high school students and graduates.

The new program envisions a complete change in the State's vocational education program in the high schools. It calls for an elective course, "Introduction to Vocational Education," an exploratory course aimed at giving students a broad look at vocations, through classroom, laboratory, (Continued on Page 8)

"We Had a Negro Problem" Says Woody Hayes at A&T Clinic

"We had a 'Negro Problem', once, I know," said Woodrow Woody Hayes, head football coach at Ohio State University, as he made the main address at the Tip-Off Dinner for the annual A&T College Coaching Clinic last week at the college.

He explained, "That was in 1959, when we had no Negroes on the team and we lost four football games. I hope that we will never again have a problem like that."

Hayes, who spent three-days here as chief clinician in football, had high praise for the contribution the Negro athlete has made to the sports world and said, "His advancement in this field has served to develop within me the highest confidence in the value of sports."

The dinner session, held on Tuesday evening, drew a mixed audience of more than 150-persons, composed chiefly of members of the Greensboro Aggie Boosters Club, Ohio State University alumni and early arrivals among the participants in the Clinic, which began on the following morning.

The Clinic, which opened on Wednesday, August 7, and continued through Saturday, August 10, drew a total registration of 196-college and high school coaches, both white and Negro, from six-states. Dr. William M. Bell, A&T athletic director and director of the Clinic, said the attendance almost doubled the first event held the year before.

Besides strictly technical information, the chief clinicians had much to say about the importance of psychology in the game and of the importance of pleasing the fans.

Ed Jucker, head basketball coach at the University of Cincinnati, who paid special emphasis to defense in basketball, said the "run and shoot" game is getting to be less and less popular. "The fans," he said, "wish now to see a balanced game in which good, sound defense is an important part."

Clarence Stasavich, head football coach at East Carolina College, emphasized the importance of psychology in the coach's relations with his players. "You must give the youngster responsibility, if he is ever to become a member of your team," he said, "even at the expense of his making errors."

Other clinicians appearing on the program included: Bob Davies, former basketball coach at Seton Hall; Joe Dean, former basketball star at Louisiana State University; Charles McCuough, head basketball coach, West Charlotte High School; David Lash, head football coach, Winston-Salem, N. C., Carver High School, and Bert Piggott, head football coach and assistant, Mel Groomes, and Cal Irvin, head basketball coach, all of the A&T College Aggies coaching staff.

Hornsby Howell, head trainer at A&T, and Al Proctor, head trainer, State College, Raleigh, N. C., teamed in a series of lectures and demonstrations on injury care and prevention.
