Negro Republican Judge In Baltimore

Harry A. Cole, a 45-year-old Negro Republican, has been appointed to be a judge on the Baltimore Municipal Court. The appointment was announced last Saturday by Maryland Governor Spiro P. Agnew.

Mr. Cole will become the first Republican to sit on the sixteen-judge Municipal Court, which was created in 1961.

Being a first is nothing new to the magna cum laude graduate of Morgan State College. In 1954, Mr. Cole became the first Negro in Maryland history to be elected to the State Senate. He won his first term in Baltimore's Fourth legislative district, the only major voting subdivision of the State which is predominantly Negro. He was narrowly defeated by a Negro Democrat four years later when he ran for re-election.

Four years after being awarded a degree in law at the University of Maryland in 1949, Mr. Cole began his personal strings of "firsts" by becoming the first Negro to be appointed an assistant State attorney general.

His last try for an elective office was in 1959, when he was a GOP nominee for a Fourth District in the City Council. He lost by about 2,000 votes.

That same year, Mr. Cole became the first chairman of the Maryland Advisory Committee to the United States Civil Rights Commission, a position he held for two years.

Mr. Cole will fill the Municipal Court vacancy created last week when Judge Robert I. H. Hammerman resigned to become a judge of the Supreme Bench of Baltimore.

In recent years, Mr. Cole has been devoting himself to the private practice of his profession.

The new judge was married to the former Doris Freeland of Baltimore in 1957. They have three daughters and live at 4801 Forest Park Avenue, Baltimore.
