SKILLS MEAN DOLLARS---

With 23 members of two earlier classes already enrolled in programs leading to jobs as first-class craftsmen, these members of a third class at the Baytown, Texas, Refinery of Humble Oil & Refining Company attend to some of the applications and other paperwork that may put them on the same road to advancement. A the accompanying article indicates, Humble's recent successes in helping long-service employees get a start toward top-rated jobs at Baytown have aroused interest at the State Department, the Veterans Administration and elsewhere throughout the country. The company, largest U.S. refiner and marketer of petroleum products, had used standard approaches with the same objective in former years, but these efforts were never successful. If even a partial "breakthrough" has been achieved, Humble believes that the problem may be that reading skills, entirely adequate for the average person at home and in many jobs, can let their owner down if, without preparation, he must tackle and try to master technical, new and much more difficult reading material, instead of the kinds of subjects matter with which he is thoroughly familiar, such as newspapers and magazines. In Humble's case, a seven-month special course of study, placing heavy emphasis on the first of the "three R's," was the start toward solving the problem. Just as important, however, was the ambition, enthusiasm and voluntary cooperation of dozens of veteran company employees, who successfully completed the 120-hour night-school course on their own time.
