UNDERSTAND LAUGUAGE OF MINORITIES, COLLEGE TEACHERS TOLD IN WORKSHOP

The failure of public school teachers to try to understand the language problems of minority groups is hampering communication between the races, according to a national authority on the teaching of English.

"Most teachers come from middle class homes," said Dr. Robert E. Shafer, professor of English at Arizona State College, "and they have difficulties understanding ethnic groups not their own."

Dr. Shafer was in Greensboro last Tuesday as a consultant to an eight-week teacher training workshop being held at A&T State University.

The 22 college teachers from institutions in North Carolina, Oregon and Utah, are trying to isolate some of the peculiar language problems encountered among blacks and other minorities.

"We need to understand that language is a part of culture and the teacher is obligated to learn the child's language," said Dr. Shafer, a noted author and former past president of the National Council of Teachers of English.

"The institute at A&T is the only one of its kind," he added. "We need some work in linguistics and we need good demonstration schools to show new methods of teaching."

Dr. Shafer said both white and black teachers must know that it is the attitude of the teacher which determines a child's motivation to learn.

Teachers who work with minorities "must understand the way their language system works," said Shafer. "We must not be out to replace a child's language system, but to add to it."

Shafer called for more understanding of the language problem on the part of the public. "We are suffering a cutback in federal funds for such programs as the one at A&T at a time when we need more and more funds," he said.
