Dr. William A. Stewart of the Washington, D. C. was in Greensboro Thursday and took issue with recent racial statements of Harvard University psychologist Arthur Jensen.

"Jensen's theory is due to a lack of understanding of the problems," said Stewart. "He hasn't assessed some of the more important reasons why Negroes don't do as well on standardized intelligence tests."

Stewart, who also teaches a course in Negro dialect at Columbia University, spoke to 30 college teachers attending an eight-week linguistic workshop at A&T State University.

"The evidence that Jensen is using is weighted," said Stew-"but most linguists know art. that the differences in performances are due mostly to language and cultural differences."

To bolster his own theory, Stewart and several other linguists have started a project to administer intelligence tests to black pupils in Philadelphia, both in dialect and in standard English. The scientists want to compare the pupils' performances each way.

Stewart said that some of the Education Studies Center in misunderstanding that surrounds the study of language is due to white liberals and middle class Negroes.

"They just don't believe that there are cultural and language differences," he added. "They don't like to talk about differences because when people talk about differences, they become identified with racism."

Stewart said that the standardized intelligence tests in use today "are based on white norms." "Based the tests on white norms and then give them to white and Negroes and I would be surprised if the Negroes didn't make lower scores."

He urged the teachers to study language more. "When the English of the children you teach doesn't sound like that of the teacher, it simply means the child speaks differently. It does not necessarily mean the child's language is bad."
