of conscious superiority; it is simply that the existence of the Christian life is a reminder of what life ought to be and a condemnation of the world as it is. It is no new thing for a man to seek to silence his conscience. The Christian as the conscience of the community must be exposed to the dislike, the hatred, and the attack of that part of the world which lives without God."

The inevitability of persecution — or being at odds with society — rings in both passages of Scripture in this lesson.

On this point Jesus was almost brutally honest. He made it clear that following him necessarily involved taking up a cross. (See Mark 8:34.) The day was to come when Christians would even be told of the "blessedness" of persecution. Indeed, throughout the New Testament we sense a conviction that when one suffers for the faith, one shares in the sufferings of Christ.

Critical Lovers

How about the Savior in this dilemma? Shall we call him a "critical lover"? What does he expect of his followers?

The question then becomes: Are we ready for critical lovers? Can we be told about our prejudices without firing back, "Communist" or starting a whisper campaign? Dare we believe that many who question the nature of our involvement in Vietnam may be very loyal Americans? Are we willing to hear what is wrong with the church — even from someone with long hair?

I believe that the greatest challenge facing Christians today is not, Will you stand up for what you believe? Rather, I think the question is, Will you be persecuted for righteousness' sake?

Father, keep us on the growing edge of life. May we welcome the challenge of new days and new ways, thankful for the struggles that sometimes burn but ultimately bless or lives. Redeem us from our enslavement to fear and free us for service in thy name. Amen.
