BENNETT COLLEGE AWARDED $715,000 BY FED. GOVERNMENT

Bennett College has been awarded $715,000 under Title III of the Higher Education Act of 1965 to be used in seven distinct, cooperative programs in which Bennett is involved with several other institutions in consortia arrangements.

Dr. Isaac H. Miller, Jr., Bennett president, said the seven individual grants totaling $715,000 will serve to strengthen the academic programs of the several colleges and allow them to engage in experimentation and do research in method and technique.

"Title III funds go to help 'developing' institutions become better 'educational' institutions," he explained. "Without this kind of support, we would be unable to undertake such vital programs."

One of the seven consortia, the Greensboro Tri-College Consortium, will receive $190,000 under the Title III grant, Dr. Miller said. Greensboro and Guilford Colleges are consortium members, along with Bennett.

The Tri-College grant will be used to extend the capacities of each member through a process of "sharing" — the joint use of facilities, resources and personnel. There will be some reinforcement of administration and development of curricula and faculty, he said.

A consortium of twelve cooperating institutions will receive a $50,000 grant for a program in which Bennett College is to take the lead in planning for education in allied health professions.

"Speaking generally, we're talking about basic training for persons who will become medical assistants, medical technologists, anaesthesiologists — the whole gamut of allied health sciences," Dr. Miller said.

"The 12 small institutions involved will be working together to develop programs which support further training in these professions," he explained. "We will reshape curricula and, when needed, bring in new faculty."

The Six Institutions Consortium, now entering its fourth year of activity, will receive $250,000. This consortium's main thrust is the incorporation into academic materials information on the contributions of blacks in social sciences, natural sciences and the humanities and performing arts.

"In each of the past three years, two persons from each school have been released from teaching responsibilities to collect pertinent slides and tapes, develop course outlines and syllabi, and revise curricula," he pointed out. "Our next emphasis will be on implementation, actually getting course studies in use. Already, they are in great demand among other colleges."

A $50,000 grants, listed with the Greensboro Tri-College Consortium but not limited to it, will involve all institutions in the region in furthering discussions on inter-institutional cooperation.

"We are moving to involve all schools of the Piedmont region in cooperative use of resources and plans will evolve as we share ideas," Dr. Miller said. "We want to get more high school graduates into colleges, and we want to encourage more students to engage in meaningful independent study, and share knowledge of how to improve the college student's chances of success and give them reinforcing experiences."

A $125,000 grant is going to the Thirteen-College Curriculum Program, in which Bennett has been active for five years. The consortium involves 13 predominantly black institutions and is devoted principally to curriculum reform in the general studies area.

"It has as one of its features the provision of more individualized instruction, more counseling, more cultural enrichments, and many broadening experiences which the college could not heretofore give their students because of prohibitive costs," he said.

"The overall emphasis is on so modifying the general studies program that students have greater readiness for advanced work. The approach has been effective in helping students to free themselves of natural inhibitions in the classroom, and in encouraging them to be more self-assertive," according to Dr. Miller.

Research in the Thirteen-College Curriculum Program has created new ways to improve the whole climate in which the student studies and has found effective ways to motivate learn-
