Opportunities For Other Income To Be Studied For N. C. Farmers

Some alternatives to the dwindling income of farmers in rural North Carolina will be investigated in a two-year research project by an economics professor at A&T State University.

Dr. Basil G. Coley, acting chairman of the university's Department of Economics, Friday received a grant of $133,941 from the Cooperative State Research Service of the U. S. Department of Agriculture.

"Much concern is currently being expressed about the development of rural America," said Coley. "When a small farmer's resources, that is, land labor, and capital do not allow him to obtain a satisfactory standard of living, the possibility of alternative sources of income outside of agriculture should be explored."

Coley said his study will be conducted of selected farmers in

Caswell, Duplin and Madison counties.

"These 3 counties that were selected for this project are almost void of industry," said Coley. "It is hoped that this study can foster economic development in these areas."

He said his study will try to determine the profitability of non-farm jobs in rural areas. "We will want to know is it as feasible and possible to establish factories in these areas where the farm income is very low," said Coley.

"We will also want to know if it is possible and feasible to retrain some of these small farmers for factory work."

Gov. Robert Scott has often alluded to the problem of finding more jobs for rural areas.

"We will have to create 8.8 million more new jobs in the
