Concepts On Child-Rearing Change With Changes In Societal Thinking

By Jack Childs

DURHAM, N. C.—WHAT's a mother to do?

How that question — any question concerning child-rearing—is answered changes often with the course of political, economic and cultural events, says Dr. Lloyd J. Borstelmann, a Duke University professor of psychology and medical psychology.

After 25 years of experience in the field of "child psychology," he has become "increasingly conscious of swings in the moods...of society in its thinking about children and their proper care."

After studying changing perspectives on what is best for children over the past half century, he also has been impressed how they inevitably reflect "the more general cultural flow."

Yet, says Borstelmann, these swings of the pendulum occur within a limited sphere of a few primary concepts: how much emphasis there should be on moral training; the heredity-versus-environment argument; the issue of whether the family or society has the major responsibility for children and their development.

The Duke psychologist has shared his ideas in a paper presented to Chelron: the International Society for the History of the Behavioral and Social Sciences.

The closely interwoven heredity-environment and family-society responsibility arguments have been related to the conservative-liberal polarities of political position in the United States, Borstelmann said.

"Those advocating radical change in societal systems have tended to view man, and especially his progeny, as infinitely malleable, while those resisting social change and adhering staunchly to the status quo have tended to view man as inherently what he becomes," he said.

"Those who favored more societal responsibility for the child's caretaking have tended to believe in more environmental determination of family integrity and child development. Those resisting societal

NEWS IN THE STATE . . .

RALEIGH — Army and Air Force Reservists are now authorized to fulfill their reserve obligations with local, state, and regional Civil Defense organizations, Secretary John A. Lang, Jr., Department of Military and Veterans' Affairs, announced Wednesday.

Secretary Lang stated the assignment of these reservists under the recently announced Department of Defense Mobilization Designee (MOBDES) Program would augment existing Civil Defense organizations by adding strength to the Civil Defense staffs. These assignments, however, will not replace present personnel, he noted.

While the Army and the Air Force have authorized the use of ready reserve officers and senior enlisted men in the MOBDES program, the Navy, Marines, and Coast Guard are considering entering the program.

Initially, North Carolina has authorized 12 Army Reservists of the 600 authorized nationally and 56 Air Force Reservists of 2,932 authorized nationwide.

The MOBDES program is to augment regional, state, and local governments in specialized fields. The specialties that have been made available by the Army and the Air Force are generally in the fields of communications, damage assessment, engineer, operations, radiological defense (radef), planning, information, welfare, logistics, mechanical maintenance, administrative, health, medical, and intelligence.

To be eligible for the program, reserve personnel must be members of the ready reserve, must save a minimum of two years remaining prior to mandatory separation, and must live within commuting distance of the Civil Defense agency to which he wishes to be assigned.

Once accepted by the local or state Civil Defense agency, the reservists will perform a minimum of 24 two-hour drills or multiples thereof annually plus 12 days annual training. The reservists will receive retirement points only for the 24 drills but the 12 days annual training will be in a regular pay status according to his rank, longevity, and other conditions of pay.

The 24 drills normally will be performed in the Civil Defense office to which he has been assigned; the 12 days annual training may be at the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency (DCPA) Staff College, or other DCPA approved schools, or such duty may be at the Civil Defense office to which he is assigned.

In announcing the program, Secretary Lang emphasized that there will be no parallel military structure set up to manage and command the individual reservist. He is detailed as a Civil Defense MOBDES to a specific office, his only area of activity and responsibility is to that office. He serves under the supervision of the office to which he is detailed.

There is no military chain of command within the MOBDES program. The Civil Preparedness Program is civilian in nature and, as announced recently by Secretary of Defense Laird, will remain so.

In other words, the military service relinquishes complete control of the reservists to civil authorities except for such administrative matters as pay allowances, points earned, and promotions, Secretary Lang stated.

Secretary Lang also emphasized that there are several major ben-
