This view shows part of the elaborate arrangements made by the Columbia Broadcasting System in their Studio Building in New York City to give to radio listeners all over the nation the election results last Tuesday night. There were more than 40 reporters, editors, copyreaders, tabulators and technicians at work, using nine news tickers, ten long-distance telephone lines and six private lines. The three men on the right, Davis, Trout and Warner, scanned the charts on the far wall and spoke into the microphones just in front of them the news and the comments which were heard in every nook and corner of the land.
