Points Out Ways For Reducing Farm Risks

Diversification of crops and livestock production are forms of insurance that help take the risk out of farming, said Prof. Earl H. Hostetler, of State College.

Diversification of crops, he pointed out, means there will be less risk of losing heavily on one crop as a result of bad weather or low prices. Crop rotations make it possible for the farmer to conserve and build up his soil so as to insure the future fertility of his land.

Livestock production provides an extra market for grain and other feed crops, encourages diversification by creating a need for home-grown feed, and supplies manure that will add fertility to the soil.

Feeding stock a balanced ration is a form of insurance against the risks of stock raising, Prof. Hostetler continued. A good silo is another help.

In this State the feeder who supplements his home-grown grains and roughages, as well as pasture, with cottonseed meal and hulls will make his other feed go farther, have a better balanced ration, and produce higher quality animals.

Professor Hostetler stressed the importance of a good silo, particularly in North Carolina.

Silage is the cheapest source of nutrients, next to pasture, and it supplies stock and cattle with a succulent feed during the winter months when fresh grazing is scarce or not to be had at all, he said.
