Legume Crops Make Nutritious Forage

Legume crops, well known as soil builders, also make excellent forage for livestock.
 They give larger yields of more nutritious hay than the common hay crops, said Dr. Frank Sherwood, nutrition chemist of the central experiment station at State College.
 Since legumes are more palatable than other hays, he continued, livestock will eat them with less waste.
 Legumes are rich in protein elements not found in the proteins of cereal or grain crops.
 Animals need all the elements in forming skin, wool, or horn material in building muscles, and for internal organs and tissues. A combination of legumes and corn provide an excellent protein mixture for cattle.
 Legume hays are too bulky for swine, however, and the corn fed to swine should be supplemented with concentrated proteins such as is contained in fish meal or tankage.
