Laughing Around the World With IRVIN S. COBB

Beautiful Snow-and Likewise Expensive

By IRVIN S. COBB

A FRIEND of mine, who has since reformed and turned magazine A editor, spent several misguided years of his youth in writing and staging vaudeville acts. Once he turned out a skit and sold it to a rough-and-ready comedian named O'Rourke, who played the star part.

On the first night of its production the author went to see it. The etting was supposed to be the interior of a hunter's cabin, into which, the by one, three characters, came from a terrific snowstorm raging without. To my friend's surprise, the first two characters, a man and a woman, burst through the doorway with no sign of white flakes on their garments. But when, a little later, O'Rourke made his appearance, it looked as though a winter avalanche had struck him.

After the curtain fell, the author went behind the scenes and interviewed the star in his dressing room.

"There's one thing I don't understand," he said. "Or perhaps it was an oversight. But I noticed that when the supporting members of your cast came on, neither of them had any snow on their shoulders."

"What?" exclaimed O'Rourke, "cover them two cheap slobs with asbestos snow at two dollars a pound? I have to buy that snow out of my own pocket and I'm going to use all of it on meself."

Will Rogers' Humorous Story

By WILL ROGERS

COUPLE of fellers were arguing in a hotel about some word or other that neither one seemed to know the meaning of, so that naturally led to a general discussion of words in general. One of these here guys finally got pretty sarcastic like and said to the other, "You're so durn smart, you are, why I bet you don't even know who wrote the dictionary."

"Don't I though," said the other one, "well, I just bet you that I do."

"All right then, you're on. Tell me who was it that wrote the dictionary?"

"Why you poor sap, it was Dan'l Webster," was the reply.
"Daniel Webster, nothing," said the wise Aleck, "it was Noah."
"Noah, hell," said the other,
"Noah built the Ark." (America News Festures, Inc.)
