More Nitrogen To Rain-Soaked Corn

Recent heavy rains have washed practically all the soluble soils in North Carolina, corn and cotton fields, and many of the heavier soils have lost much of their nitrogen, said E. C. Blair, extension agronomist at State College.

As soon as the ground is dry enough, he added, top-dressings of nitrate of soda or some other soluble nitrogenous fertilizer should be applied to corn to produce a good crop. And if more heavy rains come a little later, still another top dressing might be applied. But he warned against putting in too much at once, saying that a moderate application should be given and then another can be added later if necessary.
Blair said there isn't much that farmers can do for their rain-damaged cotton except to hope for good weather the rest of the growing season. On the sandy soils, however, applications of 50 pounds of nitrate of soda per acre may give some advantage.

The damp and rainy weather has given the boll weevil a good start, said J. O. Rowell, extension entomologist, but dusting with calcium arsenate, or equal parts of calcium arsenate and lime, will bring the weevils under control. Many farmers prefer the mixture containing lime, as the arsenate is not good for their soils, and the less arsenate in the mixture, the less damage it will do.
Lespedeza thrives in rainy weather, Blair also commented. Some fields are now growing the best stands of this crop in years, with the plants standing six to seven inches high in many cases.
