Green feed furnishes succulence, minerals and vitamins, and is rich in other essential food factors. A liberal supply of green feed cuts feed bills and aids in growing a more healthy pullet. While green feed is more important during the griwing stage, it does have a definite place in the bird's diet after laying starts. For late summer grazing and green feed, sowed young green corn may be used to good advantage, along with Sudan grass, wheat, oats; barley, slybeans, and alfalfa. If ample grazing has not already been provided, a green feed crop should be planted now. Because egg prices generally rise sharply in August, many poultry pro ducers ruin their pullets by rushing them with laying mash, Parrish said. The best plan is to let the pul lets mature normally on growing mash, corn, oats, and green feed. Before the birds are changed te laying mash, they should have reach ed at least 20 percent production.
