tered, rams is indicative of a very definite increase in the interest in sheep throughout North Carolina, reports L. I. Case, Extension animal husbandman of N. C. State College. Response to the interest, in the form of importations of Western ewes and rams, has been suggested to county farm agents by the Extension specialist.
Case said that Kentucky, one of the major lamb-producing States, is now buying about 80 percent of her ewe stock. Tennessee and Virginia are also increasing purchases of breeding sheep.
County agents are compiling lists of farmers who are interested in buying Western ewes, and registered rams from either Western North Carolina or neighboring States. We think we can buy Western ewes for $10.50 for yearlings and $6.50 for lambs, delivered, Case said.
The ewes are mainly coming into the Southeast from the Northwest, and are Hampshire-Rambouillet cross-breds. They will weigh about 75 pounds at the unloading point. They are plain in appearance, but will develop nicely under good care and will shear about 8 pounds of high quality wool. They are practically parasite free. When they are bred as yearlings they will usually bring from 90 to 100 percent lamb crops. After the first year the ewes bought by Kentucky sheep men have averaged about 130 percent lamb crops.

Case also reported to county agents the sources of registered rams available at this time. He suggested that farmers interested in increasing or entering the sheep-raising business should contact their farm agent immediately. Several Eastern North Carolina bankers have shown interest in financing the importations of Western ewes.

A New York City food chemist believes the entire population of the British Isles could be kept from starvation by airplane shipments of dehydrated foods from this country.
