Food Lockers Seen As Aid To Defense

Farmers living in areas served by frozen food locker plants can make increased use of these plants to their own advantage...

The use of frozen lockers, by packing out, reduces the amount of canning necessary, and saves lime, zinc and other metals vital to the defense program. Caddy waxed paper and cartons are used for frozen foods.

Inclosures are saved when foods are packed in the lockers through eliminating spoilage as well as waste of food which results when meat animals and poultry are carried over until needed or until "butchering weather."

Because most of the meat, fruits, and vegetables processed in locker plants are grown locally, transportation facilities, central storage, re-trailer cars, and handling facilities, and manpower can be released for emergency uses.

Farmers using lockers are likely to raise more of their own food-stuffs, Weaver believes, because foods processed in locker plants make possible greater variety in the diet and are more palatable and nutritious than foods preserved in the home by other methods. The improved diet which results should mean better health and, consequently, greater efficiency and increased productivity of farm people.

A recent survey showed that more than 75 percent of all locker plants are located in towns of less than 2,000 population, and only 2 percent in towns of 25,000 or more. Approximately 71 percent of all locker patrons were actual farmers.
