Farm Questions

Q.—What type of brooder is best for North Carolina conditions?

A.—Brooders have been devised to meet all situations from where only 40 to 50 are brooded with a lamp brooder to where many hundred are brooded with a hot water system. The source of heat may be wood, coal, kerosene, fuel oil, or electricity. The type of brooder to select will depend upon the economy of operation, availability of fuel and the cost of fuel. Practically all types of brooders have been tested and found satisfactory for North Carolina conditions. Copies of Extension Circular No. 251, "Quick Raising," may be obtained free by writing to the Agricultural Editor, State College, Raleigh.

Q.—What is the best means of protecting young orchard trees against damage by rabbits?

A.—Protection can be given by wrapping the trunk of each tree with newspapers or building paper. A repellent wash may be used which consists of equal parts of commercial concentrated lime sulphur, either liquid or powdered, and water. Then this wash should be applied with a brush. The wash can be made more effective if fish oil is added.

Q.—Do dairy cows provide a profitable sideline?

A.—Fred M. Haig, professor of dairying, says North Carolina is still lagging behind more progressive states in the number of dairy cattle. Nearly one-third of the state's farms do not own a single dairy cow, this being especially true of tobacco and cotton farms. Thousands of these farms, Professor Haig believes, could grow sufficient feed for five to ten cows each crop. This would provide a profitable source of extra cash for these farms and help the food-for-freedom campaign in addition.

A total of 10,420,000 persons were employed in agricultural work November 1, a much more than seasonal decline of 1,112,000 workers from the number on October 1.
