Favorable comment has been elicited not only here, but also in the press throughout the country, at the "conversion" step by step of the federal government to war work.

The almost unanimous reaction hails this as a necessary economy measure and as a conservation of energies for the more important task of winning the war.

Some of the measures, already accomplished, which are mentioned about are the President's direction to the heads of non-military agencies to determine how many workers they can release for war work...

This does not mean, however, that anyone feels that all which can be done along these lines has been done. It means only that the signs are encouraging.
