THIS AND THAT

By J. V. Polk

By the way, all God's children goin' to get shoes, all God's children goin' to get shoes. Didn't say anything about boots. Well, I came into the world shoeless. Now they say I can get three pairs, one pair every four months. (Where do I get the money.) I don't need any shoes in the good old summer time. I always turn my feet out, let them promenade around shoeless. I love to go out in the field after a warm thunder shower. It's so refreshing to your bare feet to feel the good old mother earth under our feet. It's really good for those tender feet to go promenading around a few weeks shoeless in the good old summer time. When [illegible] and [illegible] rolled up. He spread the hide out and had each one to step on the right as the cobbler grasped the sole to the foot. After he got the leather [illegible] over to his cobbler bench and [illegible] and the shoe [illegible] and [illegible] an apron and when the day was well nigh done, you had a new pair of cowhide shoes—the best ever—for your board. Folks hadn't yet learned to be dishonest in those days. When the old cobbler handed me my brogan shoes, I knew good and well that they had to do my feet one whole year. I remember mother telling we children not to wear our shoes until Christmas so when Santa Claus came down the fire chimney he will find our shoes nice, new and clean, then he will know you have been good children and will fill them with red sticks of candy, apples and oranges. We had not yet got our warm wool stockings. Mother bless her, was busy carding and spinning the fleecy wool into yarn. When the day was over, she got up ready for bed. We repeated the Lord's Prayer together, then to bed with "Now I Lay Me Down To Sleep." She didn't go to bed then. She sat by the open log fire in the old arm chair and knitted stockings for those little feet in bed. I could ask no more than to live those grand olden days over once again. They would be a beloved heaven to me. But alas, she sleeps the long ladies' sleep that God alone can awaken. I hope to meet her where all God's children wear golden shoes. Enshrined by the hand of the Creator Of all things beautiful and good, where they study war no more. I radiated from the human soul before we can enter those pearly gate of gold.
