Ginners Back Cotton Improvement Program

North Carolina cotton ginners, who are taking an active part in the one-variety cotton improvement program and the free classing service under the Smith-Doxey Act are not only making a fine contribution to the war demand for superior cotton but they are also helping put extra cash in the pockets of the local growers, says Dan F. Holler, Extension Cotton Marketing Specialist at N. C. State College.
 He cites the work of W. D. Westbrook of the Greens Creek community in Polk County as a good example of the cooperation between the ginner and the grower. Five years ago the farmers decided on Coker 100 as the best variety for them to grow, and each year Westbrook has brought in pure seed for his customers. This spring he placed more than ten tons of special seed of this variety with them, to provide seed plots for next year's crop. He has also equipped his gin so that pure seed can be cleaned without mixing.
 Westbrook has encouraged growers to put their cotton in the proper condition for ginning since it is impossible to do a good job of ginning on green cotton or wet cotton. In spite of a bad harvesting season last year, only 50 bales out of 1,600 bales of cotton at the Westbrook gin were reduced as much as one grade, and this was due to the cotton being either green or wet when ginned, Holler says.
 Westbrook collected samples of each bale of cotton ginned for free government classification under the Smith-Doxey Act and thus growers were able to determine the grade of each bale of cotton and its staple length. They were not only able to sell their cotton on a better basis but they could check it from a good standpoint. Forty three bales were found to pull less than one inch staple and the growers who delivered them have been supplied with purebred seed.
