

Bomber Crew To Eat Hot Food

ATLANTA. — When that son, his father, husband or friend who is riding in a B-29 Superfort over Japan, the Philippines or Manchuria, desires its show time he is going to eat—hot food.

No more dried-out sandwiches and one hot coffee out of a cold thermos bottle for him, it was learned at the Quartermaster Office Fourth Service Command, where a new food warmer device, designed especially for bombs or crews, was explained.

Until recently men on long bombing missions have been supplied with hot lunches, but after missions had been flown day in and day out over a period of time, it was discovered that the lunches were returning uneaten, officers explained, adding that fighting men must have hot, wholesome and nourishing food if they are to do their best.

The new food warmer, which solves the problem of properly feeding the crew, has six food trays, six beverage cups and six soup cups. The food is prepared at the squadron mess hall by specially trained kitchen personnel, placed in the trays and loaded aboard the plane. The warmer's electrical appliances are plugged in as one of the plane's electric circuits a little before show time and the result is a steam-hot meal something like this: tomato soup, beef pot pie, potatoes au gratin, Harvard lamb, buttered peas, corn bread and butter, jelly, apple sauce, cake hot coffee, tea or cocoa.

Meat Less Meat

Even in normal times Italians per person had only a quarter of the beef and wool to which Americans and Britons are accustomed, and less than half the French average, says the National Geographic society. Much meat was imported.

Vegetables picked at the right time have much better flavor and quality than those picked too early or too late. Correct harvest also enables many vegetable plants, such as beans and summer squash, to continue production, instead of ripening the first early pods or fruits.
