Farmers Told About Tractor Tail-Lights

RALEIGH — The Motor Vehicle Department announced today that it had received numerous complaints recently from motorists relative to farm tractors being operated on the highways at night without tail lights.

The Department said many of the tractors were being moved along the roads and highways with the bright glaring furrow light shining to the rear. Motorists, seeing the white light ahead, think it is an approaching vehicle with one headlight and on the wrong side of the road; many drivers have had to resort to dangerous sudden stops that in some instances have caused them to run into ditches or embankments. They later learn that the light was the furrow light shining from the rear of a moving tractor.

The Department stated that this is the time of year when many farmers are breaking ground with the tractors and some of them are being operated at night by use of the furrow light. However, it warned farmers who move their tractors on the public roads and highways after dark that they are subject to the law requiring tractors to be equipped with red tail lights.
