U Ban Tin, assistant director of the Burma Agricultural Service, will spend the next month in North Carolina, studying the agricultural extension service set-up. He is currently in Halifax County. Next week he will move on to Edgecombe, and two weeks later, to State College. North Carolina is one of the three states on his schedule, mainly because cotton and peanuts are grown here.

Farmers in the mountain counties are showing unusual interest in the work stock clinics being held there. More than 700 farmers participated in the series of clinics held in Ashe, Haywood and Watauga counties.
