In mid-December, the next two years, the total was following the state's coldest fall in many years, Manager John Rich had the farm's dairy cows grazing contentedly in a pasture of ladino and fescue. The pasture is a 20-acre plot which was seeded two years ago. That happened after Holding and Rich gave up on efforts to develop it as a natural pasture. In all, they have 200 acres of improved pa*s*ture, some in ladino - fescue and some in ladino-orchard grass. They seeded 60 acres more this past fall and plan to seed another 60 acres next fall. The pattern they follow is to start with alfalfa, followed by pasture seeding. In this way, Rich points out, the land provides income while the farm's herd is being built up. There are 200 cows and calves -mostly dairy - on the farm. Holding's beef cattle, a sideline. live entirely on pasture. Rich plans to graze the dairy cows regularly throughout the winter. Up to mid-December, the cows had not missed a day on pasture, and up to the first of the month had had no grain at all. Then they began getting a supplemental daily ration of 10 pounds of dehydrated alfalfa and ground corn, cobs and shucks. Production was running at four gallons of milk per day per cow. In the spring, when the cows go back on pasture entirely (and Rich says that then you can't make them eat anything else), production will rise to five gallons. An even more striking recommendation for improved pastures, Rich thinks, is the result he got with beef calves in 1950.

"We sold seven calves," says. "The oldest was seven and 650 pounds live weight They avtion of an agricultural economy eraged 300 pounds dressed-not counting thelivers, which weigh ed about six pounds apiece.

"We made that entirely pasture. And we did it in just those few months."

Successes like these are not solated cases in North Carolina. You can find the same sort of thing going on all across the state as more farmers join in the 'Green Pastures" campaign.

But the field isn't crowded by any means. Beef is always in demand, and despite its increasing milk production, North Carolina isn't self-sufficient in milk. The rise in production is not keeping up with the rise in consumption. Each year more farmers - not only North Carolinians but also many who are coming in from other states - are finding North Carolina to be a land of opportunity in livestock.
