Garden Time

By Robert Schmidt

About two months ago I commented in this column about the use of hotcaps for the protection of warm season crops such as cucumbers and melons planted before the safe planting date for those crops. Early in April one of my State College classes in vegetable crops planted water-melons at the Horticultural Farm. Every other hill was covered with a plastic hotcap as soon as planted. At that time it did not appear as though we would have much contrast between the protected and the unprotected hills. The weather was warm and the unprotected hills came up almost as soon as those under caps. However, during the past two weeks the weather has been cool—especially at night. We have left the caps on for that reason.

As of today, the unprotected plants have made little growth because of the cool weather, while the plants under the caps have made nice growth and are much larger. Also, the cucumber beetles are beginning to attack the unprotected plants. Whether or not the early advantage of the protected plants will continue throughout the season will have to be answered later.

For the benefit of the housewife who likes to grow irises, I would like to pass on the information that bearded irises may be divided and transplanted as soon as they are through blooming. New, healthy rhizomes should be selected and transplanted so that the top of the rhizome is about level with the surface of the soil. The foliage may be clipped back about one-third to one-half. Irises should be divided at least every three years. A location with full sun is best.
