Feeder Prospects Good Say Agents

With prospects for a big corn crop in Eastern North Carolina, the time is ripe for farmers in that area to consider marketing some of their grain through beef cattle.

Guy Cassell, State College extension livestock marketing specialist points out that Eastern Carolina has many advantages that can make it a leading feeder cattle area.

With the shortage of storage facilities, some farmers may not be able to take advantage of the support price on corn. In that case, they may find it more profitable to market their corn in the form of beef cattle on the hoof.

With the large amount of land that lies open in Eastern Carolina during the winter, farmers could seed it profitably to small grains for winter pasture for beef cattle. The ever-growing supply of feeder cattle in North Carolina is an excellent source for Eastern Carolina feeders.

This year, more than 5,000 feeder calves will be marketed in 14 sales over the state. Most of these calves are ideal for feeding. The best weight for Eastern feeders is 400 pounds and up, with the heavier calves feeding out a little better than the lighter ones.

As of July 1, Tar Heel hay crops totaled 1,207,000 acres, compared with 1,227,000 acres last year. Total production, however, is estimated at 1,335,000 tons, second only to 1945's record production of 1,352,000.
