While much is known about the handling and use of pesticides, a process of continuing education will be necessary in order that the average citizen might use them safely and effectively.

A good beginning will be to ask, "What are pesticides?" Simply, they are chemicals used alone or in combinations to control insects and diseases which attack plants and animals, rodents and weeds.

There seems to be no question about the fact that the future needs for food and fiber in this country will be dependent upon the intelligent use of pesticides. For this reason, it is foolish to enter into wholesale condemnation of pesticide usage just because there are cases of malpractice which have resulted in unfortunate situations.

If you had "tired blood" would you go to the medicine cabinet and down a jigger of magnesia? No. You would get just the right medicine.

But too many folk go to the garden center or pesticide dealer and buy a carefully compounded insecticide, and never read the instructions giving specific directions for dilution, proper use and precautions to observe when applying the spray or dust. And how the material can be safely stored until the next time needed.

For pesticides used on food crops, residue tolerances have been established by the Food and Drug Administration. For practical purposes, and to stay within the legal residue tolerance, the number of days prior to harvest are given for some chemicals.

It all boils down to this: read the manufacturer's instructions carefully and follow them systematically. If you do this you need not worry about the food you eat from your garden or the
