Free Wheeling

By BILL CROWELL
You may be a good driver. You may never have had an accident. But you can still get killed in traffic, mainly because of accident-causing factors over which you have no control.

Traffic authorities are aware of this danger. There are emergency situations which can in an instant put you on a deadly spot. But compensating for them is the mark of a good driver — and a live driver.

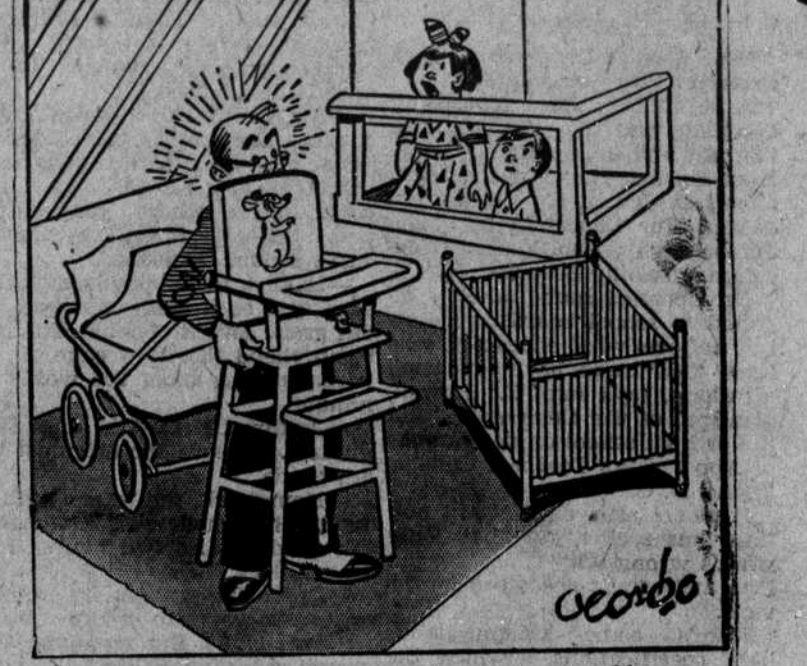

Out on the road there are all kinds of drivers, safe ones, bad ones, indifferent ones. Also cars sometimes run out of control which means if you're nearby you have an emergency situation to deal with. How you react to this sudden peril often is the difference between living and dying.

There are many common emergency driving situations. For example, suppose you are going down a steep hill when your brakes fail. The car gathers speed. You can't stop. What should you do?

Traffic experts have an answer, based for the most part on a simple recommendation: stay calm, train yourself to expect emergencies. Specifically, though, for the problem in question the right response would be to quickly pump the brake pedal, gradually pull up the emergency brake and shift into a lower gear, if possible, and get far over to the right to avoid other traffic.

Several other emergency situations and how to live through them you're driving at night along a straight road when an approaching driver's headlights hit

Ticklers By George

"Mother just came back from the doctor's. She says not to put any of that furniture up here."

fic, the best thing to do is to step on the brakes, sound your horn and steer far to the left around the bicycle.

Lastly suppose you're doing 40 or 50 on a straightway when a tire blows. What should you do? Authorities say emphatically not to hit the brakes. Instead, get a firm hold on the wheel, keeping the front wheels straight, and ease up on the gas. When you've slowed down tread the brakes lightly, then stop well off the travel portion to change the tire.

SUDDEN THAWT — Don't be the dead of winter!
LIFE LINES — Even though these lines by the Scottish poet Robert Burns were written before the days of automobiles, they are appropriate in this day and age when traffic kills and maims thousands. Many and sharp the numerous hills interwoven with our frame: More pointed still, we make ourselves. Regret, remorse and shame: And man, whose heaven erected face The smiles of love adorn Man's inhumanity to man Makes countless thousands mourn.

LINGERIE

the glamour gift that's practical too!

She loves to be glamorous, fashionable and, sometimes, a little frivolous. She likes the fragile loveliness of delicate, dainty things... but she keeps an eye on the practical aspects of doing her personal laundry. And, especially at Christmas, she deserves to be pampered. Lingerie delights her yearning for beauty, meets her demand for practicality... because it's so enchanting, yet so easy to wash and wear. See our Yuletide array.
