Group Insurance New Trend Report

The trend in group health insurance policies to provide coverage after retirement saw a sharp increase in 1962 as more workers acquired this type of protection against the costs of medical care.

The Health Insurance Institute reported today that four out of every five employees covered under group health insurance policies issued by insurance companies last year have the right to retain their health coverage when they retire. In previous years, the proportion had been two out of every three, declared the Institute.

The Institute said workers can retain their group health insurance coverage upon retiring in two ways: by converting the group coverage to an individual policy, or by continuing the coverage on a group basis. Some workers can exercise either option, the HII declared.

The Institute said its findings came from its third annual survey of new group health insurance policies, based this year on data from 44 insurance companies which were responsible for nearly 75 per cent of total group health insurance premiums written by insurance companies in 1961. The sampling consisted of 2,531 new group coverages protecting 294,424 employees and an estimated 711,000 dependents for a total of nearly one million persons.

Some 262,866, or 89.5 per cent, were provided with health insurance which they can carry into their retirement years, declared the Institute.

This figure shows a sharp increase over the previous year, the Institute stated. In 1961, some 68.4 per cent of the employees surveyed that year had the right to retain their health insurance protection upon retiring. In 1960, the corresponding figure was 67.6 per cent, said the Institute.

In addition, a 1959 study of group hospital expense plans disclosed that 55 per cent of employees and dependents had the right either to continue or convert their health coverage upon retirement.

Take Steps Now Avoid Replanting

FERTILIZER PLACEMENT
Where do you put the fertilizer in soils in row crops? Do you remember problems encountered in getting a stand of crops last year? Could this have been due to improper fertilizer placement? These questions are asked by H. R. Clapp, Cleveland County Extension Chairman.

A portion of most complete fertilizers is soluble and moves with water in the soil. If the soil is moist or a rain follows fertilization some of the fertilizer salts dissolve. As the soil dries out the solution of these salts tends to move upward, often into the root or seed zone. Damage to the young roots or seedlings can result where the fertilizer is applied too close to the roots or seeds. The problem may be observed more frequently during dry periods after planting.

Take steps now to avoid replanting or poor stands due to improper fertilizer placement, advises Mr. Clapp. Several precautions can be taken. Ask yourself these questions:

1. Do you apply less than 200 to 300 lbs. of fertilizer per acre in the same row with the seeds or roots?
  2. If more fertilizer is needed at planting, do you place it in one or two bands to the side or at least four inches below the seed or roots?
- If the answer to either question is "No", you are allowing conditions to exist which favor salt injury. Most fertilizer distributors can be modified to put the fertilizer in the soil in a band away from the seed or roots. Mr. Clapp urges you to check your equipment and make necessary modifications now. He will be glad to help you obtain the information needed to be sure that the chances of getting fertilizer injury are reduced to a minimum.
