Job Corps Is Recruiting Drop-Outs

The North Carolina Department of Public Welfare will continue to recruit male school drop-outs in 89 counties for Job Corps training.

This is the word received from the Regional Job Corps by Stephen Petritz, Chief of the Job Corps Section of the State Welfare Department.

President Nixon transferred the Job Corps from the Office of Economic Opportunity this past week to the Labor Department.

With the shift, it was announced that 59 Job Corps conservation centers, two men's urban centers, and seven women's centers will be closed by July 1, 1969. The closings are based on a relatively high incidence of dropouts and insignificant change in the achievement levels experienced by these 59 centers. Some 17,000 youth are involved in the center closings and all will be offered the right to transfer to other Job Corps centers.

The Administration proposes to establish some 30 in-city residential Job Corps centers. Charlotte is the only city in this State slated for such a center. These centers will be established from the 1970 fiscal year budget and will be dependent on contracts between the Federal government and private industry.

In view of all the changes taking place in the Job Corps program nationally, the State Welfare Department has been asked to continue recruiting male drop-outs between 16 and 21 for enrollment. Center assignments will be delayed some four to six weeks due to the closing of the 59 centers and the transfer of the 17,000 youths already enrolled in these centers.

The State Department of Public Welfare has 11 Job Corps counselors on its staff who will continue to interview and screen candidates in the 89 counties. At the end of the past fiscal year, 1,485 male youths from North Carolina were enrolled in Job Corps centers across the country. During the past two years these Job Corps counselors have completed 4,663 applications for training.

Watch Other Driver, Too

RALEIGH — It was one of those things that always happens to someone else. Then, on Saturday, April 12, 1969, it happened to you.

You were driving along a two-lane highway in eastern North Carolina, well within the speed limit. You were completely sober and an darter — at peace with the world. Several cars were approaching you in the lane to your left, so you pulled a few inches nearer the edge of the pavement on your right.

Then, in less time than it takes to hit the brakes or go for the shoulder of the road — or do anything — one of those approaching cars whips into your lane and hits you head-on.

It was the other guy's fault. He pays for his mistake. He's dead. BUT you'd better care less. You're dead, too.

The man you just met is listed as North Carolina traffic fatality number 375 for the year 1969. You get number 376. His name was listed first on the accident report that came into the Department of Motor Vehicles.

Curious about the fellow who turned you into a statistic? Of course, there was no way you could have been. But, if you had known what the computers at the Motor Vehicles Building in Raleigh knew, you would probably be alive today.

You wouldn't have been on the same highway with a man who had been arrested four times in the last ten years for driving on the wrong side of the road and once for illegally passing on a curve.

And that's not all. He'd been arrested twice for following too closely. He had been involved in two accidents. His license had been revoked twice.

Perhaps ironically, when he killed you, he did it with a valid license to drive on the streets and highways of North Carolina. His record had certainly indicated that he would eventually kill himself, and probably someone else. And that record indicated he would probably do it exactly the way he killed you — driving on the wrong side of the road. But North Carolina law said he had a right to drive.

If it's any consolation, you were not the only innocent victim of drivers who killed themselves in North Carolina during the week of April 6-12. Motor Vehicle Department records show that, not counting the fellow who killed you and killing himself, there were eight other drivers who died in highway crashes for which they were responsible. And they carried four completely innocent people with them.

What kind of drivers were these people who killed themselves and others? Ask the Motor Vehicle Department's computers and you have your answer in a matter of seconds. Including the one that got you, those nine drivers had been involved in 22 accidents — 31 accidents if you want to count the last one. There were a total of 35 traffic law violations on their driving records. Only one of the drivers had a clean record. Another had nine convictions, including speeding, reckless driving, drunken driving and driving after his license had been revoked.

Traffic safety officials feel that something must be done to remove the chronic traffic law violator from the streets and highway. But they haven't found the answer. Until they do they advise responsible motorists to look out for the other guy. His time may be up. And he may take you with him.
