way: "I'll carry Cleveland County strong and to the least break even in Gaston." How much better than "break even" will be determined by the work in Gaston, especially eastern Gaston, where the candidate plans to be more and more and "just about all the time" in October.

He is making a point of teaming with Marshall Rauch, Gaston Democrat in the Senate, who is running for re-election.

As a businessman, Harris has made plans to cover the eventuality of his election, which would mean being in Raleigh perhaps 120 days every two years.

Bennett J. Masters has been named manager of Harris Funeral Home, Harris said he would have no reluctance to leave the business in the hands of Masters and the other employees there, and that "the business will continue as before."

As a matter of fact, Harris thinks the state lawmaking body ought to meet every year. "The business is big enough that we need it" and he is ready to attend annual sessions.

Looking forward to the opening of the General Assembly next year — and assuming his election in November — Harris sees redistricting looming as a big issue — again.

He notes, with a grin and a shake of the head, one of the oddities resulting from present House and Senate districts: "Clarence and I can't vote for each other."

He meant Clarence Leatherman, who is a member of the House from the District made up of Gaston and Lincoln Counties, and who lives in Lincoln.

Harris lives in Cleveland and is running in the Senate district made up of Gaston and Cleveland.

"In Gaston we're running together... but we can't vote for each other."

One thing Harris does not want changed is the Gaston-Cleveland District. He was repeating earlier assertions in which he pointed out what seem to him to be great community of interest between the people of the two counties and their cooperation to date, and plans for the future, in such matters as mental health and law enforcement.

On some of the other issues, Harris stated his case:

He does not believe in closed sessions of public bodies dealing with public business with public money.

"Any politician will tell you he's against closed sessions when he's running," Harris said. But he said that during his years as coroner, he has never closed an inquest even though he has the legal power to do so and has been asked to.

He is in favor of repealing the soft drink tax and of raising the tax on cigarettes from two to five cents a pack, which he says would bring in the same amount of revenue.

He is in favor of lowering the gasoline tax "at least a penny." He is particularly interested in it because, he pointed out, Gaston and Cleveland are both on the South Carolina border and the tax has been "detrimental" to Tar Heel operators.

He is in favor of raising teacher salaries if it can be done from General Fund money and without raising taxes. He said he is opposed to increasing any tax. It's "no time for that."

"I think that the children who are unable to go to kindergarten ought to be given some type of schooling so they could be at least partially as able as the children who do go to kindergarten when they get to the first grade."

Harris became convinced of that, he said, from observing the benefits to his own grandson from going to kindergarten. All children might have such benefits under some kind of state-aid program, he said.

At the other end of state aid to education, Harris favors aid to non-state higher education institutions. His reasoning is based on money and efficiency.

"It is my understanding from talking with Marshall (Rauch) and others that the state can save money by aiding the students who go to non-state-supported schools" by reducing investment in new state school facilities.

"If that's the case, I am in favor of it."

Also in connection with education Harris said he's particularly proud of the textile school at Belmont, and also of a smaller one in Shelby. "They need help."

On law enforcement, Harris has two special thoughts. One is to obtain greater manpower for the State Bureau of Investigation, and the other is to try to improve the operations of courts.

His primary aim in the former is to enable the counties to get more law enforcement aid, especially in control of drugs.

He wants stiffer penalties for people who peddle such things as marijuana.

In the matter of the courts, he wants cases not to linger so long on docket, especially those involving felonies.

"I don't know how to do it, but I hope we can remove drunken driving from the highways; 50 per cent of the fatalities are caused by it, according to my information."

Harris said he would be in favor of the vote for 18-year-olds "only if they were given full citizenship." If the matter were left in the hands of the states.

He notes, however, that Congress has passed a national 18-year-old voting law.

Harris is opposed to abolishing capital punishment, but he continues to receive mail urging abolition.

Finally, he is against liquor-by-the-drink because he believes that is the feeling of most people in his territory.

Harris said he expects to do more of the type of campaigning in which Democrats in a group call from town to town.

"Basil (Whitener) and John Friday and Hamp Childs are hard to keep up with on foot," he said, "but it's a good way to meet more people."

"And that's what I want to do in Gaston County."

Fair Manager E. L. Weathers recently announced that Dittmann Mitchell of Kansas City, Missouri will stage a five performance World Championship Rodeo as the night grandstand feature of the 1970 Fair. He said the Cleveland County Fair was extremely fortunate to get the Rodeo for this year's fair since the only place they usually perform in North Carolina is at the State Fair.

An internationally known rodeo star will be featured at the Cleveland County Fair Rodeo with the appearance of the veteran cowboy clown and comedian Roger Mawson of Fort Smith, Arkansas. (Grandstand shows begin each evening at 7:30 p.m.) Mawson has appeared at every major rodeo on the north American continent during the last ten years and is no newcomer to North Carolinians as he has been featured several times at the State Fair in Raleigh and is also a veteran of two foreign tours, one throughout the European cities and one of the far east.

He presents in addition to comedy routines a highly popular equine attraction featuring "Peggy" the comedy grey mare that is known to millions particularly in this country and Canada. After a decade in the arena and millions of miles of travel Peggy will be officially retired at the conclusion of the new Madison Square Garden Rodeo in New York this year but will make one final curtain call at Shelby and be replaced by the new grey mare, a registered American Quarter-horse mare that has been in training in California and in Arkansas for the last five years.

A tall lanky typical westerner, Mawson has a ready wit and a quick grin that has earned him millions of friends wherever he has appeared and language problems have never been a barrier in foreign lands for he is both a pantomime and action clown and will see action a plenty in the most dangerous game indulged in by human beings — as a safety man in the wild Brama bull riding where he will serve as one of two of the ever popular cowboy clown turned bull baiters luring the wild maddened bulls away from the erstwhile cowboy bull rider.

The bull riding is always the finale of the professional rodeo and always the thriller and favorite of the fans. In this department, Mawson will be teamed with another nationally known cowboy clown to add to the safety of the contestants.
