Stepped Up Enforcement Noted In Federal Wage For Farm Labor

Expressing concern that substantial numbers of farm workers covered by the Federal minimum wage law are not receiving their rightful wages, the U. S. Department of Labor's Wage and Hour division today promised a stepped-up effort to bring covered farms into compliance with the law.

Wage and Hour Area Director Fred E. Carlock, whose office is located at 401 BSR Building, 316 East Morehead Street, in Charlotte, said today that compliance officers will undertake an educational effort with farm workers and their employers on their wage rights and responsibilities under the Federal law. "If this educational effort does not produce more substantial compliance," Carlock said, "action will be sought against people who employ farm labor at less than the agricultural minimum wage rate. The rate is currently $1.30 an hour."

Carlock pointed out that many farm workers are either unaware of the $1.30 an hour minimum wage in agriculture or do not call violations to the attention of the Department of Labor for fear of losing their jobs.

Similarly, he said: "Many farm employers do not appear to be aware of the requirements which the law imposes."

Farm work was brought within coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act by amendments in 1936, and the minimum wage of $1.30 an hour must be paid to every worker who is engaged in covered employment by an employer who used more than 500 man days of farm labor in any calendar quarter of the preceding calendar year.

Exempt from the farm minimum wage are: (1) farm workers employed by employers who did not use 500 man-days of farm labor in any calendar quarter of the preceding year; (2) migrant hand harvest laborers 16 years of age or under and employed on the same farm as their parents under specified circumstances; (3) employees principally engaged in the range production of livestock; (4) members of the employer's immediate family; (5) local hand harvest laborers under specified circumstances.

Workers described in (4) and

(5) above are not counted when totaling man-days for minimum wage purposes.

Further information is available at the Wage and Hour Office.
